Iron, Fire and Water...

...and Man

Swordsmith Toshihira Osumi was born in 1932 in Ota City, Gunma Prefecture. In 1952, he moved to Sakaki Town, Nagano Prefecture to be apprenticed to master swordsmith Akihira Miyairi (Living National Treasure and later named Yukihiro) and study sword making. In 1958, he returned to Ota City and became an independent swordsmith. He has since won the Masamune prize, which is the highest prize of all, three times in the "Shinsaku Meito Ten (Modern Master Sword Contest)." He lived a life dedicated to sword making, receiving freedom of the city of Ota in 1988 and being certified as Preserver of Important Intangible Cultural Property (Living National Treasure) in 1997. Osumi was tirelessly devoted to forging suguha-style blades until he passed away in 2009 and was praised as "Osumi of suguha blades." His home has been converted into the Oosumi Toshihira Museum, which opened in November 2012 as a facility to hold regular exhibitions of the swordsmith's works. Come and appreciate the excellent works of swordsmith Osumi, who led a life dedicated to the pursuit of suguha-style blades.

The Art and Craft of the Japanese Sword

The Japanese sword sought ultimate beauty, combining ceremonial beauty and practicality. In modern days, it is recognized as a fine steel art and craft that has no parallel in the world, owing to its forging method. In this regard, Toshihira Osumi has left the following words.

A fine sword is sharp;
if not, it is not a fine sword.
A sharp sword is not a fine sword;
a fine sword does not cut.

Toshihira Osumi

名刀は切れるもの
切れずれば名刀にあらず
切れるから名刀にあらず
名刀は切れるものにあらず
